Hospice Care Ottawa is asking for more money to provide end-of-life care to more people in the city's west end.

The organization, which manages 19 beds in central Ottawa, is extending a fundraising campaign that has already raised $6 million to expand the Ruddy Shenkman Hospice in Kanata.

"Now's the time to add to it, rather than wait and try to do a renovation," said Lisa Sullivan, executive director of Hospice Care Ottawa, a non-profit organization that offers end-of-life and palliative care, services and programs at no cost to Ottawa residents.

The initial $6 million raised by the group meant 10 temporary overnight beds could be turned into permanent beds. Now, Sullivan said they are hoping to raise an additional $1.5 million to cover rising costs and add two more beds.

More hospice beds translate to lower wait times in other parts of the health care system, said Gerry Teller, president of the
